Labor Supply Dynamics Among Employed Workers with Mental Illness (job market paper)

This paper investigates the influence of mental illness on health-dependent labor supply using data from the Medical Expenditure Panel Survey (MEPS) focusing on employed adults. It examines the effects of diagnosed mental illness and self-reported measures of mental well-being on health-induced absenteeism, considering job characteristics' role in amplifying or mitigating this impact. Results reveal a robust estimate of an additional day of absence per year attributed to mental illness or related symptoms. Furthermore, the study finds that employer-sponsored health benefits, while generally increasing absenteeism by promoting labor substitution for health-related needs, serve to alleviate the impact of mental illness on absenteeism. Notably, individuals reporting high mental distress alongside an official diagnosis exhibit lower absenteeism compared to cohorts with equivalent distress levels but no diagnostic history, eluding to the importance of promoting mental well-being among workers for firms aiming to optimize long run productivity.
